BONJOUR French Prime Minister Jean-Marc Ayrault (center) acknowledges the arrival honors given to him by President Aquino on the Malacañang grounds on Friday shortly before their bilateral talks on biomass energy and a grand Philippine exhibit in a French museum. Ayrault is the first French head of government to visit the country.

THE VISIT of French Prime Minister Jean-Marc Ayrault, the first by a French leader in 66 years, indicated the "deepening relationship" with the Philippines and a signal that France was ready to engage the Philippines as a "vibrant and dynamic partner," officials said yesterday.

Following talks with Ayrault and witnessing the signing of two agreements with France in Malacañang last night, President Aquino said the visit was "an affirmation of how we value the development of a more dynamic and robust partnership" between the two nations.

"This is a partnership that enjoys a firm foundation," Mr. Aquino said, citing the visit of his mother, the late President

Calungsod will be made patron saint of the young

By Philip C. Tubeza

AS THOUSANDS of Filipino Catholics troop to Rome, millions more across the Philippines are gearing up to celebrate the canonization of the country's second saint, a missionary killed 340 years ago who is being promoted as a youth hero.

The Catholic faithful are expected to gather in different church events as the nation's major television networks broadcast live tomorrow's ceremony at the Vatican during which Pedro Calungsod, who was hacked to death while trying to convert locals on the Pacific island of Guam, will be made a saint.

Pope Benedict XVI will formally raise Calungsod to the altar.

Iqbal: We are still Filipinos

By Nikko Dizon

"WE ARE Filipinos."

That was Mohagher Iqbal's answer when Marvic Leonen asked him if the playing of the national anthem would be all right for the leaders of the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF).

Leonen said he raised the question during talks with MILF leaders in Kuala Lumpur prior to the Oct. 15 signing of the Framework Agreement on the Bangsamoro. The playing of the national anthem was to be part of the signing ceremonies.

When Leonen, the chief government peace negotiator, heard the answer of Iqbal, his counterpart from the MILF, he told himself, "This is the best proof against all skeptics that there is going to be a separatist movement down south."

Manila exhibition focuses on Pinoy craftsmen

AIMING TO secure true craftsmanship and beauty to contemporary living, Manila FAME 2012 has made "the art of the craftsman" its theme this year. The annual exhibition focuses on Pinoy craftsmen, who work with local materials like rattan, buri, abaká, bamboo, abaca, shell and papier-mache furniture, and other furnishings that are uniquely Filipino.

The full theme is a mouthful, "The art of the craftsman equals the soul of the Philippines," but the spotlight is clear. Manila FAME is all about the country's top creative professionals and homegrown brands in the design industry.

Tessa Prieto-Valdes

The event highlights this year are the Ten Design Houses, Garden and Fashion Pavilions, and the Crafts and Style Spots. There are also specialty areas like the Deep Market place and HIOs.

10 Design Houses

James Roach, project director for Manila FAME 2012, was tapped by Citem to put together a team of lifestyle designers and marketers. Selected internationally acclaimed and upcoming Filipino designers created the 10 Design Houses. Taking design to the ultimate level, these designers cleverly combined the country's indigenous materials with their individual sensibilities.

The Garden Pavilion connects buyers and visitors alike to the environment, with a refreshing setting called Joys of Life Alfresco. It is a collaboration among Manila FAME's creative team: project director James Roach and internationally renowned designers Budji Layug and Kenneth Cobonpue, and visual merchandise specialist Ito Kish.

SEN. Loren Legarda with the T'boli tnalak weavers from Zamboanga del Sur.

Garden Pavilion

Kenneth Cobonpue's special setting stands on the left of the Garden Pavilion. It features his signature and innovative pieces with a minimalist black backdrop. Kenneth has new lines showing his whimsical side like the Zaza Chair, with a palm leaf forming over a dining seat. The Trapee collection uses finely woven rattan over a solid wood base to continue the timeless elegance the brand is known for. The HIVE collection of lighting and accessories also introduces new designers like Ebony Allen from New York, Olivia D'Aboville from Manila, and Mona Alcudia from Cebu.

Kenneth is excited to announce the opening of his first stand-alone showroom in Metro Manila in March 2013. Located at the ground floor of the Greenbelt Residences in Makati, the 300 square meter space marks the beginning of a new era for the brand by celebrating its origins with innovative and classic products over the past decade including the HIVE brand of unique lighting and accessories.

For Craft Spots, Filipino artisans elevate Philippine design and artisanship through their fine preservation of age-old tradition and centuries-old disciplines, which are also useful to the export industry. On the other hand, Style Spots display avant-garde products from a cross-merchandise presentation of color, texture, material and form, focusing on the three leading macro trends in the world today—eco-sustainability, hyper-localism and living in connection.

KENNETH Cobonpue and HIVE showcase their newest collections in the recent Manila FAME. Eggy, Trapee, and Ragusa headline the exhibition. Paperwork, Menagerie and the Anemone feature HIVE's original and organic take on home lighting and accessories.

Budji + Royal Booth at Manila Fame: David Layug, Tessa Valdes, Budji Layug and Royal Pineda

Manila Wear collection

Manila FAME also continues the Manila Wear collection in the Fashion Pavilion, curated by Josie Natori. Manila Wear aims to catapult the Philippine fashion industry into the global market. This is my favorite section with lots of accessories and décor in every color throughout.

From weaves made from handloom fabric with gold leather inserts to an exclusive clutch featuring textured shell inlay to bold fashion jewelry and gift items using irregularly cut stone handcrafted by Ivory artisans using the ancient lost wax method, Manila Wear showcases individualized and personal fashion styles that caters to a world market that only sees mass productions of similar styles.

KENNETH Cobonpue and Rosalina Ocampo, showroom director of Kenneth Cobonpue Manila

Hibla Pavilion of Textiles and Weaves of the Philippines is an exhibition aimed at showcasing our rich and colorful heritage through the Schools of Living Traditions. Sen. Loren Legarda is the heart of this wonderful program, ensuring indigenous techniques in textile weaving, basket making, beadwork and embroidery are passed on to the next generation. These creative endeavors reveal anecdotes of the individual soul, of the community, and of our Filipino saga. At the opening, Senator Loren was joined by Rose Aldeal de Ayala and Rep. Teddy Casiño.

Manila FAME 2012 showcases over 250 exhibitors. Check it out at the SMX Convention Center as today is the last day. Check www.manilafame.com.ph for details.

Carless Sundays

GREEN ARCHITRENDS

Amado de Jesus

METRO MANILA is not a pedestrian-friendly city.

Jeepneys, buses, trucks, cars, tricycles and recently motorcycles swirl uncontrollably through the streets with no regard for lanes or signals. Pedestrians risk their lives as drivers often disregard pedestrian lanes—all these amid the blowing of horns and smoke belching of poorly maintained engines.

Compared to our Asian neighbors, like Singapore or Malaysia, most of our streets are very poorly designed and give more priority to vehicles rather than pedestrians. This probably accounts for the high rate of accidents on the road.

According to the Road Safety Program of the Philippines, 36 percent of our total population is below 15 years old. They are the most vulnerable to road accidents. Pedestrians and their motorcycles are the road users most at risk. And to think that motorcycles increase by 40 percent yearly. The cost to society of traffic accidents is reported to be about one percent of GDP.

It's not surprising then that malls are very popular destinations in Metro Manila. Inside the climate-controlled malls, people can sit around, socialize, get entertained and do so many things without being run over by vehicles.

Pedestrians are fighting back with a claim on the city streets, and cars do not rule especially because they cause pollution.

Reducing car dependence

In 1994 the Accessible Cities Conference in Spain sparked a movement in many countries worldwide aimed at reducing car dependence. It included Iceland, Britain, France and eventually a Europe-wide initiative by the European Commission. Soon it spread to other countries like Brazil, Canada, Japan and Taiwan.

According to the Washington Post, the event, called World Car-free Days, "promotes improvements of mass transit, cycling and walking and the development of communities where jobs are closer to home and where shopping is within walking distance."

Today Bogota, Colombia holds the world's largest car-free weekday event for the entire city to begin closing off streets every Sunday in 1976. Today more than 70 miles of streets in Bogota are closed every Sunday and 1.5 million people take over the streets riding bicycles, strolling, jogging and skateboarding.

Jakarta car-free day

In 2007 Jakarta held its car-free day which closed the main avenue of the city and allowed pedestrians to use the streets normally full of cars and traffic. Since May 2012 Jakarta has been observing car-free day every Sunday.

In Naples, Italy, all vehicles were removed from the seaside boulevard—making it possible for its citizens to hear the sea once again, not just the sound of cars. Today the people can walk, bike, skateboard and socialize in the area.

Pasig City together with civil society groups, launched a few months ago, the weekly bike day, health day and carless Sundays. The program aims to restore family bonding, friendships and a sense of community while conserving with Mother Nature. Let's hope that other cities in Metro Manila and throughout the country would follow the example of Pasig City.

Bioluminescence and the future of lighting

DESIGN DIMENSIONS

Esther Arreza Anunciacion

SOMETIME IN 1999, I stumbled into news of a new lighting system called "Colorkinetics." It was an "intelligent" digital lighting technology developed by the US company of the same name, and it made use of "light emitting diodes" or "LED." Apparently, LED wasn't new technology then, back in the '70s, they were already being used in small electronic devices as indicator lighting. Its technology slowly developed from a four-inch, low-light device into the first-ever intelligent illumination system as built on by the Colorkinetics' cofounders. That was all of 13 years ago.

The modern day LED light as we know it today is digitally controlled and consumes very little energy. In all its multicolor glory, LED systems light the skyline of world's big cities and is slowly replacing yesterday's incandescent and fluorescent fixtures. Fortunately, their efficiency now reflects a significant cost savings on power that we never expected new light technology could accomplish so soon.

Bioluminescence

But the more dramatic ones are the little creatures that exhibit the quality of "bioluminescence" or the ability to generate their own light. These organisms produce the enzyme luciferase, which interacts with a particular type of light-emitting molecule called luciferin, and this combination produces light—much like a light stick where chemical compounds mix to produce a glow of light. It is a familiar concept to those who have gone night diving where plankton and jellyfish glow under the evening sky. Scientists say that approximately 90 percent of deep sea animals are bioluminescent. On land, we have fireflies as the most popular bioluminescent creature.

The concept behind bioluminescence is very different from that of incandescence, where a lot of power is needed to create light. Because heat is hardly produced in the production of its light, bioluminescence has also become known as "cold light."

What makes bioluminescence fascinating is that the animals themselves produce and use the light for attracting prey or fending off attackers. Essentially, for survival skills.

The Dutch lighting and design company, Philips, has begun exploring the possibilities of bioluminescence, and has produced an experimental "biolight." "Biolight" makes use of bioluminescent bacteria fed with methane gas and composted material. In Philips' experiment, the biolight was a part of a much larger conceptual called a Microbial Home system, "a cyclical biological ecosystem where wastes like sewage, effluent, garbage, wastewater are filtered, processed and recycled to be used as inputs for the various home functions." In other words, it works as part of a zero-energy, zero-waste home.

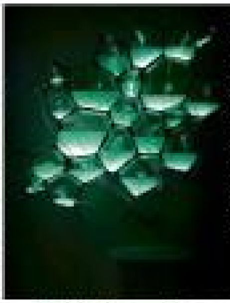

Human waste

In the Philips model, glass cells hold the live bacterial culture that needs very soft green lighting when fed through silicon tubes from the food source. And what exactly is the methane food source? You guessed it: human waste.

But bioluminescent light, despite all the promise it holds, is limited in producing ambient lighting due to the low light-emittance of the biological species. There are experimentations filling the cells with other fluorescent proteins that can magnify the bacteria's light into a brighter light and make it more usable for other functions. But its development for practical use is still far-fetched. Biolight will probably be used where low light levels are needed as in exit signs, night time road marks and signage, step lights for cinemas, theaters and other dark spaces, hallway lights, and even atmospheric lighting for therapy and mood enhancement.

The biolight experiment could potentially create "living" energy products that are self-energizing, self-repairing and even self-reproducing. However, Philips claims that the current light model is not considered a prototype for a future light fixture but rather, a concept for discussion, conceptualization and experimentation. It opens up our thinking to unconventional light models. While the thought of lighting plants fueled with organic technology may still be remote, it's a concept that may someday be made possible. Judging from how solar LED lights came into being, the future for bioluminescence may be closer than we think.

Erehwon Center for the Arts sets maiden show

THE NEWLY-ESTABLISHED Erehwon Center for the Arts makes its debut in the art scene with its Volume 1 art exhibit on Saturday, October 27 (Saturday), 4:00 p.m. at #1 Don Francisco Street, Villa Beatriz Subdivision, Old Balara, Quezon City. The exhibit which runs until November 20, features the works of 53 visual artists.

Erehwon is a new independent center for artists, cultural workers and arts enthusiasts. One of the largest places of its kind in Manila, the center occupies a four-storey building inside a sprawling compound and houses several art galleries, a storeroom and an art residency facility. Open to holding regular art exhibitions and annual residency programs, the center was envisioned as "a space where artists can build more collaborative, experimental and reflective practices over time," according to the center's Executive Director and visual artist Noel Gauli. "We aim to strengthen the local community of artists based on the principle of reciprocity where people can enrich each other's art-making process and work towards a more critical reflection of art's history, aesthetics and practice," he added.

Erehwon co-founder and businessman Rafael Bendoy said the center aims to bring the work of Filipino artists to a broader public within and beyond the country. "We aim to reach a wider and increasingly global audience through collaborations with various institutions, individuals and organizations."

Slow motion in small-town Korea

Believe it or not, there's a mudfest in Korea–and it's not hosted by a striptease joint. And people sleep in the open air even while Radiohead is playing live

By Christian Brazil Bautista

SOUTH Korea must be the best country in the world to be homeless. Perhaps that is not something you would read in a Lonely Planet, and it is doubtful that South Korean tourism authorities would include that information in their next 30-second spot on cable news.

Nonetheless, you have to love a country

More than RED-I

This electronica artist is inspired by 'the vibes and energy' he gets from music

By Almo Pleno [illegible]

THERE are many kinds of music out there—rock, hip-hop, electronic, classical, jazz, blues, country—and I have been lucky enough to have been exposed to all these different kinds of music.
